

ARTICLE

A welcome reappraisal of

PETER HUJAR

2 October 2018

BY: BRAIN KARL

Peter Hujar is one of those artists who remained relatively unknown to the larger art world in his own lifetime yet achieved much recognition from other artists of his generation – among his better-known peers are Diane Arbus, Robert Mapplethorpe and David Wojnarowicz (with whom Hujar shared an intense relationship). His reputation has, however, grown significantly since his death from AIDS-related pneumonia in 1987, as his photographs have entered major museums and became the subject of numerous exhibitions in the US and Europe. The current exhibition ‘Speed of Life’ at the Berkeley Art Museum, which has travelled from the Morgan Library and Museum in New York, continues this revaluing of Hujar in a career-spanning survey of the photographer’s work.

Hujar was a key figure in New York’s downtown art scene; his photographs document aspects of New York’s underground from the late 1960s to the arrival of the AIDS crisis in the ’80s. Hujar initially began working in fashion photography in New York in the 1950s and ’60s, but then dedicated himself to depicting the types of subjects that likely helped keep him from earlier art world acceptance: a candid focus on male bodies, naked and in drag, and a desire to capture the mysterious, often unknowable realities of others.

Working in black and white, Hujar favoured pared-back settings, allowing his subjects to be seen intimately through complex plays of shadow. He frequently portrayed notable cultural friends and acquaintances, including Fran Lebowitz, William S. Burroughs and Susan Sontag, but he just as intently produced finely wrought images of lesser-known figures, alongside careful depictions of animals, buildings, and landscapes. In his portraits he discovered intense geometrics through a range of poses – in the odd hand-on-shin lean of the dancing form of Ethyl Nude (c. 1979), in the muscular dog's body in Bouche Walker (Reggie's Dog) (1981), and in the sideways architecture of Collapsed White Shack (c. 1985).

The great stillness of Hujar's images comes in part from the fact that he often shot his human subjects while they reclined, a technique that contributes to the vulnerability of his portraits. Yet there's a sense of movement in many of the works on view as well, a result of Hujar's concentration on contorted physiques or fragmented body parts – such as Paul Hudson, Leg (1969) or little obvious glamour.

He was drawn toward showing the trappings of culture without buying into the artifice it created. Having withdrawn from the world of fashion, Hujar was affected by the grittier developing aesthetics of downtown

Gary Schneider in Contortion (1979) – and in the sharply cropped busts of people sitting or lying down.

The exhibition includes arguably Hujar's most famous portrait, Candy Darling on Her Deathbed (1973). Here, the transgender performer lies dying of lymphoma in a hospital bed, consciously playing her own death scene, bewigged and made up. The idea of life as a performance is a recurring theme in Hujar's work, which he explored by acknowledging the artifice involved in such acts. Masks and veils that only partially obscure or transform appear frequently in his work, alongside his more direct photographs – such as his depictions of the performance and drag artist Ethyl Eichelberger, whom he showed in a series of poses both understated and unconventional. Even when depicting more prominent or conventional celebrities – such as Isaac Hayes, Peggy Lee, or Madeleine Kahn – he used lighting, makeup, styling, and positions which, while never unflattering, possessed

New York during a period when many aspects of the city were undergoing an unprecedented physical degradation, and a complex social and cultural evolution.

GARY INDIANA VEILED (DETAIL)
(1981), PETER HUJAR.
COURTESY OF PACE/MACGILL
GALLERY, NEW YORK, AND FRAENKEL GALLERY, SAN FRANCISCO; © 1981 PETER
HUJAR ARCHIVE LLC.

Susan Sontag (1975), Peter Hujar. Courtesy
Pace/MacGill Gallery, New York and Fraenkel
Gallery, San Francisco; © Peter Hujar Archive, LLC.

Fran Lebowitz at Home in Morristown, New Jersey
(1974), Peter Hujar. Courtesy
Pace/MacGill Gallery, New York, and Fraenkel Gallery,
San Francisco; © 1974 Peter
Hujar Archive LLC.

Candy Darling
on her Deathbed
(1973), Peter
Hujar. Courtesy
Pace/MacGill
Gallery, New York, and Fraenkel
Gallery, San Francisco; ©
1973 Peter
Hujar Archive
LLC.

Ethyl Eichelberger as Minnie the Maid (1981), Peter Hujar. Courtesy
Pace/MacGill Gallery, New York and Fraenkel Gallery, San Francisco; ©
Peter Hujar Archive, LLC.

Self-Portrait Jumping (1974), Peter Hujar.
Courtesy Pace/MacGill Gallery, New York, and Fraenkel Gallery, San Francisco; © 1974 Peter
Hujar Archive LLC.